Worked great. Association of the Th1-like cytokine profile with atherosclerosis development in human renal allografts. The development of atherosclerosis in human transplant recipients has been associated with chronic rejection and a number of proinflammatory cytokines and chemokines. However, the role of the Th1/Th2 cytokines in allograft atherosclerosis is controversial. To identify the role of Th1/Th2 cytokines in the development of allograft atherosclerosis, we evaluated the levels of Th1 and Th2 cytokines and the cellular distribution of these cytokines in coronary and carotid atherosclerotic lesions in 22 human heart transplant recipients. Allograft atherosclerotic coronary (n=14) and carotid (n=5) arteries were studied to identify the cellular composition of the vascular lesion. The cellular distribution of the Th1 and Th2 cytokines was then analyzed in the intimal and medial vascular wall layers. Furthermore, the effect of Th2 cytokines on the differentiation of human dendritic cells was studied. Compared with healthy human controls (n=12), Th1 cytokine levels were significantly higher in coronary and carotid atherosclerotic lesions, whereas Th2 cytokines were lower. The levels of Th1 cytokines in coronary and carotid atherosclerotic lesions were higher than those of the Th2 cytokines. The Th1-like cytokine profile was associated with a significantly higher macrophage content in coronary and carotid atherosclerotic lesions. Moreover, the distribution of the Th1 cytokines was within the medial vascular wall layers. Activated Th2 cells in the allograft vasculature did not influence human dendritic cell differentiation. These results suggest that a Th1-like cytokine profile is a risk factor for coronary and carotid atherosclerosis after human heart transplantation. The presence of activated Th2 cells did not influence the differentiation ba244e880a
