component, a crosslinked polyorganosiloxane and a catalyst which is solid at 20.degree. C. and has a melting point of 50.degree. C. or higher. However, none of these techniques offers an adequate solution to the problem of adhesion. The most significant problem arises when a conventional adhesive or paint is applied to a metal object and cured. When the object is subjected to heat, humidity or immersion in water, adhesive residues on the object are dissolved or eroded, the dissolving action tending to be more marked the higher the temperature or the greater the acidity of the solvent. Consequently, an adhesive which is applied to a metal object, for example, has a higher adhesive strength when the object is cool than when it is hot, and the strength lowers when the object is immersed in water. The problem is that in order to maintain the adhesive strength during long periods of storage in the cold or immersion in water, large amounts of the conventional adhesive must be used. A significant improvement over this state of affairs was brought about by the technique described in JP-A-59-133384. The improvement involved in this technique involves the preparation of an adhesion promoter comprising a solvent for the conventional adhesive and an alkoxy group-containing silicone resin having a hydroxyl group and a hydrolyzable group on its molecule. This technique has, however, been found to be still unsatisfactory in many cases because of the lack of uniformity of curing of the adhesion promoter. Further, there are cases where a sufficient adhesive strength
