A: Man in the Middle Attack An attack on an HTTPS site in which the proxy intercepts the HTTPS communication between the server and browser, and alters or replaces data in transit between the browser and the real server. The attacker's goal is to cause the server or browser to return data that will be used by the client to convince the client that he is in fact connected to the server. This attack is generally used to test the security of an implementation of HTTPS. Not all websites that offer TLS service for HTTPS are affected by this attack, since not all of the TLS and HTTPS implementations are affected. To perform an MITM attack, the attacker first determines the address of the intended server, such as by sniffing traffic on the network. By watching the traffic to that server, the attacker can determine where the authentication of the connection occurs. An example of an MITM attack is a man-in-the-middle attack, in which an attacker forces a victim to connect to an HTTPS server under their control, and then intercepts and alters the TLS communication between the server and client to replace an HTTP request with a different HTTP request (see Figure 1). By doing this, the attacker can make the victim think that they are connected to a different server than the real server (see Figure 2). Figure 1: A
